

“You Can’t Write a Poem about McDonald’s” by Ronald Wallace

Noon. Hunger is the only thing singing in my belly.
I walk through the blossoming cherry trees on the library mall, past the young couple coupling, by the crazy fanatic screaming doom and salvation at a sensation-hungry crowd, to the Lake Street McDonald’s.
It is crowded, the lines long and sluggish.
I wait in the greasy air.
All around me people are eating-- the sizzle of conversation, the salty odor of sweat, the warm flesh pressing out of hip huggers and halter tops.
When I finally reach the cash register, the counter girl is crisp as a pickle, her fingers thin as french fries, her face brown as a bun.
Suddenly I understand cannibalism.
As I reach for her,
she breaks into pieces wrapped neat and packaged for take-out.
I’m thinking, how amazing it is to live in this country, how easy it is to be filled.
We leave together, her warm aroma close at my side.
I walk back through the cherry trees blossoming up into pies, the young couple frying in the hot, oily sun, the crowd eating up the fanatic singing, my ear, my eye, my tongue fat with wonder of this hungry world.
